

Dear String Player,

First of all I would like to congratulate you on taking on the challenge of learning to play an instrument. Instruments like violin really need a lot of dedication, time, practice and even a bit of struggle now and again.

What if you had the chance to share your experience while you go through this? What if you could get extra support from others like you from around the world and teachers like me (in addition to having a private teacher) who have dedicated their lives to this art form?

I am creating SuperStrings Studio with the intention of creating a safe space full of inspiration, encouragement and expertise born out of a life dedicated to teaching and performing music.

Some people have scoffed at me for the career I have built for myself but I do indeed work both from the stage as a performer and as a teacher in schools and in SuperStrings Studio.

Currently I live in southwest Germany, in the town of Böblingen. This year I decided to take SuperStrings online to build a community of like-minded learners and teachers who are interested in fulfilling their potential not only as musicians but as people, making connections with all sorts of people across geopolitical boundaries, in the name of doing something positive for our world. I grew up in the US, lived for ten years in the People's Republic of China, and now I have lived in Germany for four years. I think this whole idea came about due to the fact that my students and I move long distances and I wanted to make something personal that would be available any time.

If you want to be part of this just drop me a line, introduce yourself, get back in touch, leave a comment or even a photo of yourself and your instrument. I would love to hear from you!

From the bottom of my heart I wish you every success in your learning and that you will one day master your instrument!

Lots of love,

Bonny
